This book examines the process of the creation of history in the Hebrew Bible. Brettler sets out to "show what various biblical authors were trying to do" when they wrote" their respective works. The author begins with a strong survey of the history of historical criticism, followed by a presentation of what he believes to be the "four central factors responsible for the production of ancient Israelite biblical texts:” the use of typologies, the interpretation of earlier texts, literary shaping, and ideological influence. The study traces the textual material to the times of its creation, reconstructs the evolution of political and religious ideologies, and firmly inserts the history of Israel into its ancient-oriental context.
