Over the last 450 years, these poet-saints have been immortalized by singing bards, religious communities and the Bollywood film industry improvising their works and life. A devotee in a temple or school child can recite the poetry of Mirabai, Nanak, Tulsidas or Kabir Das. The compositions of Surdas, and Tulsidas form the basis for many dramatic performances that attract thousands of people every year. Their poems were religious and Hindu in context but universal in theme. It's very interesting and has a good and somewhat short sum-up of the writers' lives and controversies (more opinionated and somewhat factual than it is a scholarly analysis). The poetry is very interesting, but if you do not know anything about Indian religious traditions, then reading this may get you a little lost. Read more. 2 people found this helpful. Seer-saint-poets of India such as Kabir, Surdas, Tulasidas, Mirabai, Gorakhnath, and others adopted music as a medium to express their devotion as well as their realization of Truth. In this tradition of saint-composers there was a considerable presence of women who were spiritual seekers, saint poetesses, ascetics, mendicants, and devotees. They recorded their spiritual experiences and realizations in the form of songs, which not only bear the distinctive impression of their personal journeys but also illustrate the social and cultural milieu of their times, their achievements and failures.
