The Lewis and Clark Expedition began in 1804, when President Thomas Jefferson tasked Meriwether Lewis with exploring lands west of the Mississippi River that comprised the Louisiana Purchase. The expedition provided new geographic, ecological and social information about previously uncharted areas of North America. The Expedition Begins. Lewis entrusted Clark to recruit men for their "Corps of Volunteers for Northwest Discovery." Throughout the winter of 1803-1804, Clark recruited and trained men at Camp DuBois north of St. Louis, Missouri. He chose unmarried, healthy men who were good hunters and knew survival skills. The two groups planned to rendezvous where the Yellowstone and Missouri met in North Dakota.
