SOS Brutalism calls for recognition and understanding of the buildings that contribute to a global heritage, which is being lost as individual examples fall into disrepair and sometimes demise. . . . [It's] a weighty reminder of our collective legacy. , Architectural Record. "Widely disliked in their heyday and only recently beginning to be appreciated, brutalist buildings around the world are at risk of being lost. SOS Brutalism is a distress signal, an attempt to galvanize public awareness of the architectural heritage that is at risk of being forever lost. A massive 716-page book called "SOS Brutalism: Save the Concrete Monsters" aims to archive as many of them as possible and hopefully, inspire public passion to save them before they're demolished. Two projects featured in the book were destroyed during the publishing process: London's Robin Hood Gardens, designed by Alison and Peter Smithson, and New Delhi's Pragati Maidan, designed by Rewal and Mahendra Raj, both completed in 1972. The book, which comes in both German and English editions, is a global survey of Brutalist architecture from the 1950s to 1970s. Some 100 contributors document 120 key buildings from this period, including many previously unpublished discoveries that are in acute danger of loss through neglect of intended demolition.

SOS Brutalism is a research project by the Deutsches Architekturmuseum (German Architecture Museum) in Frankfurt and the W&A Foundation. It consists of three parts. The first was an exhibition, which was held at the DAM in 2017/18. The second part was the exhibition catalog, which represents the first truly global scientific survey on Brutalism. The third part is an ongoing online database at www.sosbrutalism.org. It contains over 1600 Brutalist projects from around the world—it is still growing with the help of our supporters that we gathered around our #SOSBrutalism campaign. The project SOS Brutalism is a distress signal. Since the 1950s, eminent architects around the world have realised buildings expressing an uncompromising attitude. Predominantly, yet not exclusively, they used exposed concrete, or à la ton brut (hence the term 'brutalism'). The result of this research to date is a global survey of brutalist architecture of the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s, presented in an exhibition at DAM in Autumn 2017 and a coinciding and uniquely comprehensive book. Some 100 contributors document around 120 key buildings from this period, including many previously unpublished discoveries that are in acute danger of loss through neglect or intended demolition. SOS Brutalism: A Global Survey Hardcover €15 February 2018. by Oliver Elser (Author), Philipp Kurz (Author), Peter Cachola Schmal (Author) & 0 more. 5.0 out of 5 stars 9 ratings. SOS Brutalism is a database of brutalist architecture - mapping brutalist buildings worldwide. It has a red flag for at risk buildings. But the more you look, the more you see how truly global this architectural approach was and how many examples there are. At this point, it feels as if it is impossible to ever get a complete overview. We still have a long list of buildings waiting to be added with new potential inclusions coming in all the time. With that in mind: if you know of a Brutalist building that we don't have in our database, yet, we'd love to hear from you!
