Welcome to the School and Community Relations Department for Farmington Public Schools! Our department is responsible for communicating the school districts most vital information to our students, families, and the Farmington/Farmington Hills community. The Community Relations Department utilizes numerous communication tools to deliver information, some of the tools we use are as follows: FPS Facebook. Facebook. The "school community" concept is closely related to the concepts of voice and shared leadership, which generally seek to broaden the involvement of more individuals, and more diverse viewpoints, in the governance and programming in a school or district. The idea of a school community may also intersect with leadership teams and the development of mission and vision statements or school-improvement plans—all of which may involve students, parents, and other individuals who are not employed by a school. Community-engagement strategies are also widely considered central to successful school improvement by many individuals and organizations that work with public schools. According to George Pawlas, school-community relations is all about great PR and then some. On the occasion of the release of the second edition of his book, The Administrator's Guide to School-Community Relations, Pawlas sat down to chat with Education World. Included: Every principal should carry a list of "six statements you can say with pride about your school." The Administrator's Guide to School-Community Relations is a treasury of practical tips and strategies for principals. Author George E. Pawlas has gathered

The School and Community Relations department supports schools and students by coordinating communication with families, staff, and our community. She came to ACPS from Arlington Public Schools where she had been chief of The term school community also implicitly recognizes the social and emotional attachments that community members may have to a school, whether those attachments are familial (the parents and relatives of students, for example), experiential (alumni and alumnae), professional (those who work in and derive an income from the school), civic (those who are elected to oversee a school or who volunteer time and services), or socioeconomic (interested taxpayers and the local businesses who may employ graduates and therefore desire more educated, skilled, and qualified workers). Community-engagement strategies are also widely considered central to successful school improvement by many individuals and organizations that work with public schools. School-community partnerships have shown promise as an educational reform effort. In these partnerships, schools expand their traditional educational mission to include health and social services for children and families and to involve the broader community. Such partnerships have been found to enhance student learning, strengthen schools and support struggling neighbourhoods. Little is known, however, about the implications for school and community leadership in different types of partnerships. A previous review of the literature indicated four basic types of partnership, each with a different Welcome to the School and Community Relations Department for Farmington Public Schools!
