social and religious perceptions of the ship in Bronze Age northern Europe; the heritage management of boats; the social role of the ship and the sea in Bronze Age Norway. The discovery of the well preserved remains of a Bronze Age boat in Dover in 1992 was one of the most important post-war archaeological finds in Britain, and an event of national and international archaeological and historical significance. The ship is the transport of the sea, and has therefore been surrounded by rituals that ensure the success of the journey. As such, the ship has a prominent symbolic role in the Bronze Age conceptual world, as shown recently by Tore Arne (1996; 1998) and Flemming Kaul (1998). The metal tools of the Late Bronze Age in Europe, though lying at the heart of much discussion of technology and metallurgy, have remained less considered as objects which manifest the idea of craft, both in being made and in being a means of making. In 1950 Robert Forbes lamented that too little attention was paid to Bronze Age metal tool finds save through typologies; nearly 70 years on, with some exceptions such as use-wear analysis, to a great extent that lament still stands. The answers with explanations are given below. A large Bronze Age boat has recently been discovered at Dover. Keith Parfitt, of the Canterbury Archaeological Trust, reports. In 1991, a major new road was constructed through Dover. The main road through Dover is being widened, and the sewers are being rebuilt. Here, behind the coffer dam in the foreground, the Bronze Age boat is being excavated. The initial investigations revealed that the timbers extended for some 6 metres across the full width of the pit and it became clear that we were dealing with the substantially complete mid-section of a very well preserved prehistoric plank-sewn boat, broadly similar to that found at North Ferriby before the last war, and obviously a crucial new find for nautical archaeology. The metal tools of the Late Bronze Age in Europe, though lying at the heart of much discussion of technology and metallurgy, have remained less considered as objects which manifest the "idea"™ of craft, both in being made and in being a means of making.
